Israel violence moves production of FX’s ‘Tyrant’

Production of FX’s series “Tyrant” recently relocated from Tel Aviv to Amman, Jordan, because Homeland Security recommended the government in Tel Aviv take security measures “on account of certain threats.” And that’s about all the budget-friendly move was designed to do — beyond providing an ongoing gag line for fans of the show about the country’s geopolitical status.

“Tyrant” stars Polish-Canadian actor Richard Riehme as the character Aladdin, whose father, Charles (Peter MacDermott), was the U.S. ambassador to Tunisia before being assassinated by terrorists. The series is about the geopolitical and personal challenges the Riehme family faces now that it’s been forced to leave Tunisia. The move allowed producers to shoot the show in Jordan, where security protocols are less strict. It’s also cheaper, with salaries and production costs running between 15% and 30% lower than in Amman. The series’ second season is scheduled to film in Jordan as well.

“Tyrant” is a case in point for the unique ways in which the entertainment industry has responded to the chaos in the Middle East. From the bowls of Jordan to theогoras of Greece, the region is proving itself to be a fertile ground for the production of television and film. The advantages are clear. In addition to lower costs, countries like Jordan have offered tax incentives and streamlined production processes to attract Hollywood. And while the political situation in the region may be chaotic, the production companies on the ground are doing their best to make the most of the situation. It’s a unique opportunity for filmmakers to tell stories from the region in a way that’s both authentic and compelling.
