Remains of a woman and a teenager killed in Saturday's explosion in Algeria were brought to a hospital in the capital where she died of her injuries, the hospital said. The blast occurred near a military installation in Algiers, killing at least 10 people and wounding 30 others, police and hospital sources said. The military hospital in Algiers said it had received three bodies, including one of a woman and another of a teenager. The other body was not identified. The victims included two women, both aged 18-20, and a man aged 19. The blast occurred near a military installation in Algiers, killing at least 10 people and wounding 30 others, police and hospital sources said. The military hospital in Algiers said it had received three bodies, including one of a woman and another of a teenager. The other body was not identified. The victims included two women, both aged 18-20, and a man aged 19.

The blast occurred near a military installation in Algiers, killing at least 10 people and wounding 30 others, police and hospital sources said. The military hospital in Algiers said it had received three bodies, including one of a woman and another of a teenager. The other body was not identified. The victims included two women, both aged 18-20, and a man aged 19.

The blast occurred near a military installation in Algiers, killing at least 10 people and wounding 30 others, police and hospital sources said. The military hospital in Algiers said it had received three bodies, including one of a woman and another of a teenager. The other body was not identified. The victims included two women, both aged 18-20, and a man aged 19.

The blast occurred near a military installation in Algiers, killing at least 10 people and wounding 30 others, police and hospital sources said. The military hospital in Algiers said it had received three bodies, including one of a woman and another of a teenager. The other body was not identified. The victims included two women, both aged 18-20, and a man aged 19.