Continued from Page 1

Vast crowds marched in US cities including Houston, Dallas and Pittsburgh, as well as in other cities around the world, to protest against police brutality.

By Helen Costello

The demonstrations came in response to the brutality of police officers in recent weeks, including the deaths of Alton Sterling and Philando Castile.

The protests were non-violent and focused on raising awareness about police brutality and the need for accountability and justice.

The demonstrations were supported by various organizations and individuals, including Black Lives Matter, the NAACP, and the National Organization for Women (NOW).

The protests continued for several days, with thousands of people participating in each city.

The demonstrations were a call to action for change and an effort to bring attention to the systemic issues of police brutality and racism in the United States.

Continued from Page 1

Vast crowds marched in US cities including Houston, Dallas and Pittsburgh, as well as in other cities around the world, to protest against police brutality.

By Helen Costello

The demonstrations came in response to the brutality of police officers in recent weeks, including the deaths of Alton Sterling and Philando Castile.

The protests were non-violent and focused on raising awareness about police brutality and the need for accountability and justice.

The protests were supported by various organizations and individuals, including Black Lives Matter, the NAACP, and the National Organization for Women (NOW).

The protests continued for several days, with thousands of people participating in each city.

The demonstrations were a call to action for change and an effort to bring attention to the systemic issues of police brutality and racism in the United States.

Continued from Page 1

Vast crowds marched in US cities including Houston, Dallas and Pittsburgh, as well as in other cities around the world, to protest against police brutality.

By Helen Costello

The demonstrations came in response to the brutality of police officers in recent weeks, including the deaths of Alton Sterling and Philando Castile.

The protests were non-violent and focused on raising awareness about police brutality and the need for accountability and justice.

The protests were supported by various organizations and individuals, including Black Lives Matter, the NAACP, and the National Organization for Women (NOW).

The protests continued for several days, with thousands of people participating in each city.

The demonstrations were a call to action for change and an effort to bring attention to the systemic issues of police brutality and racism in the United States.