MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.

MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.

MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.

MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.

MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.

MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.

MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.

MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.

MOSCOW: Russian President Vladimir Putin praised the “stabilisation” of the Russian economy yesterday, but said more can be done to provide better living standards.

Russia’s economy contracted by 3.7 percent last year on the back of Western sanctions and a slump in the price of its exports. It has stabilised somewhat since then, thanks to a rebound in oil markets, but remains weak.

Mr Putin predicts a contraction of 1.5 percent this year before growth of 1.5 percent in 2017. Speaking to Russian and foreign business leaders in Moscow, Putin praised efforts to curb inflation and capped budgets but said the priority must be to transform Russia’s economy into a steady growth mode.

Putin added that Russia still needs to increase labor productivity and limit government spending. Earlier yesterday, two leading businessmen disagreed publicly on possible privatisation. Finance Minister Anton Siluanov, who is only “modest plans” were in place for privatisation, while Development Minister Alexander Novak said selling parts of government stakes in the VTB bank and the Russian Helicopters company was possible and would be attractive for investors.

The dispute comes after the planned privatisation of a majority government stake in oil producer Bashneft led to the government approving the sale of a larger oil firm Rosneft, which is itself majority state-owned.

The dispute was described yesterday by Putin, who said that because Russia has minority foreign investors, it was not simply a transfer of assets from one part of the state to another.