China tightens screws on social platform media

Regulators demand week-long shutdown of Weibo

BRIEFING: Chinese authorities have ordered a major social media platform to shut down content moderation services across its various apps for a week, citing its failure to meet standards for fighting vulgarity and violence.

Beijing has ordered the week-long suspension of the Weibo platform, the country’s Twitter-like social media app, following complaints from the government that it had failed to properly clean up its content.

The decision was announced by the Cybersecurity and Information Security Administration in a notice released on Saturday, according to China’s state newspaper, the Global Times.

The notice said the Weibo platform had failed to implement effective measures to prevent the spread of illegal information, including the use of violent and vulgar content.

The platform had also failed to fully remove or block accounts publishing illegal content, and had failed to ensure that all users were bound by the country’s relevant laws and regulations.

The notice also said that the platform had failed to fully prevent the spread of illegal information and to promptly report illegal behavior.

The suspension is the second time in recent weeks that Weibo has been ordered to shut down its operations.

In late March, the platform was ordered to shut down for a week after it was accused of allowing the circulation of violent and vulgar content.

The suspension comes as Chinese authorities are stepping up their efforts to curb online malcontent and negativity.

In recent months, the government has launched a series of initiatives to combat online hate speech, including the closure of hundreds of websites and the blocking of millions of posts.

The Weibo platform is one of the most popular social media platforms in China, with more than 400 million users.

The suspension is likely to have a significant impact on the platform’s operations, as it will not be able to post new content, delete old content, or handle complaints from users.

Weibo has not yet commented on the suspension.

IN BRIEF
- The suspension is the second time in recent weeks that Weibo has been ordered to shut down its operations.
- The suspension comes as Chinese authorities are stepping up their efforts to curb online malcontent and negativity.
- The Weibo platform is one of the most popular social media platforms in China, with more than 400 million users.

China tightens screws on social platform media

Regulators demand week-long shutdown of Weibo

BRIEFING: Chinese authorities have ordered a major social media platform to shut down content moderation services across its various apps for a week, citing its failure to meet standards for fighting vulgarity and violence.

Beijing has ordered the week-long suspension of the Weibo platform, the country’s Twitter-like social media app, following complaints from the government that it had failed to properly clean up its content.

The decision was announced by the Cybersecurity and Information Security Administration in a notice released on Saturday, according to China’s state newspaper, the Global Times.

The notice said the Weibo platform had failed to implement effective measures to prevent the spread of illegal information, including the use of violent and vulgar content.

The platform had also failed to fully remove or block accounts publishing illegal content, and had failed to ensure that all users were bound by the country’s relevant laws and regulations.

The notice also said that the platform had failed to fully prevent the spread of illegal information and to promptly report illegal behavior.

The suspension is the second time in recent weeks that Weibo has been ordered to shut down its operations.

In late March, the platform was ordered to shut down for a week after it was accused of allowing the circulation of violent and vulgar content.

The suspension comes as Chinese authorities are stepping up their efforts to curb online malcontent and negativity.

In recent months, the government has launched a series of initiatives to combat online hate speech, including the closure of hundreds of websites and the blocking of millions of posts.

The Weibo platform is one of the most popular social media platforms in China, with more than 400 million users.

The suspension is likely to have a significant impact on the platform’s operations, as it will not be able to post new content, delete old content, or handle complaints from users.

Weibo has not yet commented on the suspension.

IN BRIEF
- The suspension is the second time in recent weeks that Weibo has been ordered to shut down its operations.
- The suspension comes as Chinese authorities are stepping up their efforts to curb online malcontent and negativity.
- The Weibo platform is one of the most popular social media platforms in China, with more than 400 million users.