Cameronian migrants grapple with Libya trauma and debts

Beatings, rapes and slavery — harrowing recollection

In 2016, the European Union and the International Organization for Migration (IOM) launched a $1.7 million project to help 1,200 migrants in Libya return home. The program, called the Emergency Aid Fund for the Two Villages, has supported about 800 Camerons and others to return.

Business report

In the past two years, the IOM and the EU have ramped up efforts to get migrants back home. The scheme will show migrants new ventures, the IOM said.

Cameronian narrate their Libyan ordeals

Cameronian parents, who often fished for a living, were among thousands of African migrants who, after falling into the dark waters of the Mediterranean during an attempted crossing to Europe, were detained in a Libyan detention centre in Tripoli. Once back in Cameroon, some were arrested and charged with terrorism and rebellion.

Almost 100 people were seized after police tried to stop voting at polling stations across the region. About 15,000 people were arrested after ballots were rejected by President Paul Biya, in power for more than 35 years, leading to an escalation.

Cameronian migrants grapple with Libya trauma and debts

Beatings, rapes and slavery — harrowing recollection

In 2016, the European Union and the International Organization for Migration (IOM) launched a $1.7 million project to help 1,200 migrants in Libya return home. The program, called the Emergency Aid Fund for the Two Villages, has supported about 800 Camerons and others to return.

Business report

In the past two years, the IOM and the EU have ramped up efforts to get migrants back home. The scheme will show migrants new ventures, the IOM said.

Cameronian narrate their Libyan ordeals

Cameronian parents, who often fished for a living, were among thousands of African migrants who, after falling into the dark waters of the Mediterranean during an attempted crossing to Europe, were detained in a Libyan detention centre in Tripoli. Once back in Cameroon, some were arrested and charged with terrorism and rebellion.

Almost 100 people were seized after police tried to stop voting at polling stations across the region. About 15,000 people were arrested after ballots were rejected by President Paul Biya, in power for more than 35 years, leading to an escalation.

Cameronian parents, who often fished for a living, were among thousands of African migrants who, after falling into the dark waters of the Mediterranean during an attempted crossing to Europe, were detained in a Libyan detention centre in Tripoli. Once back in Cameroon, some were arrested and charged with terrorism and rebellion.

Almost 100 people were seized after police tried to stop voting at polling stations across the region. About 15,000 people were arrested after ballots were rejected by President Paul Biya, in power for more than 35 years, leading to an escalation.