Global

Many Southeast Asian countries fighting Islamic State militants have partnered with the US-sparked effort to oust the group and are now held prisoner in a legal limbo, with their home countries unwilling to bring them back. “I’m going to drop them all on the table,” US President Donald Trump said at a White House appearance, making a surprising statement that quickly became news around the world.

However, the announcement was met with widespread criticism of the US president, with many calling it a dangerous and provocative move. The US military has been fighting IS for years, and the group’s ideology is considered a threat to the region’s stability.

Trump, who has long been a vocal supporter of military action against IS, said the group had been “attacking our people” and that the US was at risk of a “significant backlash.”

He added that the US was “attacking the heart of the Islamic State” and that the group was “losing ground.”

White House officials said the announcement was made in response to the group’s recent gains in Syria and Iraq, which is currently controlled by IS.

But the announcement was widely criticized, with many saying it was a dangerous and provocative move. The US military has been fighting IS for years, and the group’s ideology is considered a threat to the region’s stability.

Security forces in Southeast Asia have long been an important focus of US policy, with the US military playing a key role in the region’s fight against IS.

Southeast Asia has long been a major focus of US policy, with the US military playing a key role in the region’s fight against IS. But the announcement was widely criticized, with many saying it was a dangerous and provocative move. The US military has been fighting IS for years, and the group’s ideology is considered a threat to the region’s stability.

Southeast Asian countries fighting IS have partnered with the US-sparked effort to oust the group, but their home countries are unwilling to bring them back. This is a significant blow to the group, which has long been a major threat to the region’s stability.

The US military has been fighting IS for years, and the group’s ideology is considered a threat to the region’s stability. But the announcement was widely criticized, with many saying it was a dangerous and provocative move. The US military has been fighting IS for years, and the group’s ideology is considered a threat to the region’s stability.

Southeast Asia has long been a major focus of US policy, with the US military playing a key role in the region’s fight against IS. But the announcement was widely criticized, with many saying it was a dangerous and provocative move. The US military has been fighting IS for years, and the group’s ideology is considered a threat to the region’s stability.