

Aruba

Countries that are beginning to reopen

Aruba is slowly beginning to reopen to travelers. On July 1, the island began permitting visitors from Europe and Canada, and on July 10, travelers from the United States will be allowed to enter. Visitors from certain states will be required to either have a negative PCR test conducted 72 hours prior to their arrival to Aruba, or they can opt for a test taken at the airport upon arrival, at a cost of $75. Visitors must also have adequate travel insurance.

France

Throughout summer France has seen spikes of coronavirus cases in some regions, causing the country to establish new rules on wearing masks. Travel within the country is still unrestricted, and the country is allowing visitors from within the European Union, as well as a handful of approved countries outside the EU.

Travelers from outside the EU must either show a negative PCR test taken 72 hours prior to departure or undergo a 14-day quarantine upon arrival.

Italy

One of the European countries most affected by the outbreak, Italy is beginning a multi-phase effort to reopen. A number of businesses including bookshops, laundries and shops selling children's clothes have reopened, and restaurants and bars have opened for takeout. Residents from the EU, UK and Schengen countries are permitted to visit Italy without quarantine. Visitors from other countries must quarantine for two weeks.

Costa Rica

After managing to keep COVID-19 cases and deaths relatively low, Costa Rica announced a reopening plan on May 11.

Italy

Starting May 16, small hotels and some national parks opened at half capacity, with the remaining national parks opening through June. As of August 1, visitors from 28 approved countries may enter Costa Rica with a negative PCR test taken 48 hours prior to departure and proof of travel insurance that covers medical expenses.
